If the guy down the street is in trouble, are there lessons for you to learn? Doctors call this a warning signal. In the lemming-like world of bank strategy development, a bank in trouble can renew your belief in banking fundamentals. There is no successful get-rich-quick scheme in the banking business. Growth, profits, share of market and service quality are long-term propositions.

First Interstate's campaign in Washington state is a good example. It is titled, "We're looking ahead." While it's futuristic, it's founded on a history of being leaders with people and products. This leaves customers feeling the bank looks forward to serving its customers even better.

In conjunction with an examination of the bank's strategy, managers were briefed that First Interstate did not have loans concentrated by industry or geographic area.

The bank shifted employee communications and community development into high gear. The staff was encouraged to be visible. From the president to the janitor, bank people got involved in programs as diverse as the Special Olympics to leadership in the state-sponsored program to improve relations with China.

The bank has now completed its reexamination of its long-term strategy and made adjustments where necessary. Basic marketing and communication will reaffirm that direction in customers and staff.

A good strategy? Fundamentally. ■ relates to, among other things, is the phenomenon of volatility in our business. The second point is that in order to function this way, it will be necessary to have the ongoing capability to liquify and reposition earning assets in these volatile markets. In other words, the concept of acquiring assets to hold to maturity won't be as characteristic in the future of the successful competitor as it was historically.

As I've said, the successful competitor will bid for assets, put them on the books, but be able to disinvest from those assets at a reasonable cost when they no longer suit the book of the institution or the risk profile that the management wishes to take. Successful intermediaries, including banks, will use the secondary markets to accomplish this and therefore it follows that trading, or competence in trading in financial instruments, will be very necessary to perform in this fashion.

Simply put, it does not make sense to book a 10-year loan and carry that loan on the books of the institution through periods in which that loan is hurting earnings performance or contributing negatively to the structure of the balance sheet.

The third point is that success in competitive terms obviously will continue to involve paying money market rates for liabilities, whatever they are, and in whatever market they are being raised, charging finer rates on loans and yet still earning an acceptable rate of return on capital.

These first three points add up to one potentially important thought, which is that given the nature of the asset and liability markets that we have described here, it is possible over time that n t as much capital may be required in a financial business with this kind of profile.

Obviously, capital is still needed to support an asset portfolio and the risks of loss inherent therein, but increasingly I think one better way to make a return on capital with a business franchise that has these kinds of asset and liability dynamics will be simply to increase leverage. We can say, I think, that the current discount of intermediary securities from book value that we've talked about earlier tends to point, I think, in this direction over time.

Too Much Earning Too Little

But what the market is saying is that in many instances there is too much capital in traditional financial businesses that is not earning an acceptable rate of return relative to other choices in the marketplace.

Fourthly, the successful competitor will be relatively strongly invested in the new modes of distribution and productivity will be much higher. Taking full advantage of the technologies that are available, unit costs will be significantly lower in the successful competitive enterprise than they are today. Not simply stable, but lower. The successful competitor will drive for lower costs to remain in the competitive marketplace. And when you think about it, it's pretty obvious that this has to be the case. If financial margins are going to be both lower and about the same for everybody, then nonfinancial costs will be the significant competitive differentiating factor in many markets and in many segments of the industry over time.

Next, there will be increasing differentiation between the retail and wholesale-oriented business in financial services. The day of the general approach to the market, in my opinion, is over. The dynamics of competing successfully in the retail business are too different from the wholesale-oriented financial services businesses. And successful competitors will increasingly recognize that point and organize and manage their affairs accordingly.

Most of the better-managed banks today already do a great deal of market segmentation work and with that effort comes an understanding that the profit dynamics, the costs, the risks, the customer characteristics and the margins are different in each market.

The successful competitor will continue to unbundle businesses in these terms. Unbundling will, in my view, affect many functions which today tend to be centralized in most financial intermediaries. For unbundling leads to the organization of more discrete businesses serving a particular set of customers. To be successful and positively motivated, the line managers of these businesses must be in control of all of the factors that produce the results in the business that they manage, so that many currently centralized functions, from funding to data processing, will be progressively decentralized in the successful competitor and tend to be located within the business units themselves.

Complete Product Lines

Business differentiation in this sense will be characteristic of winners in the game. Further, the winners will have complete and competitive product lines in their respective businesses. To be in the retail banking business, for example, you will have to offer products and services which are competitive with the full array of competition, including banks, life insurance companies, thrifts, investment banks, and the rest of it.

Few would have predicted the success of the money market funds, both in the banking industry and in other parts of the financial services universe. But the implication of this phenomenon is obvious: customers are increasingly able, as we have said, to assimilate and evaluate financial information about service alternatives, and make their own judgments about the financial risks involved when a new service is available. They increasingly tend to take the best product that is available, being relatively neutral about the institution that sponsors that product.

The winners in competitive terms are going to have product superiority in these terms. The winners, going on, will use the technology that is available to integrate their respective business portfolios into increasingly discrete businesses.

One of the human issues, and particularly in the larger financial enterprises, including banks, is that we have evolved into excessively complex organizations. It is difficult to structure businesses, and jobs within those businesses, in such a way that people have a full set of responsibilities, as I have said, for the business results and get rewarded accordingly.

This suggests that one of the critical dimensions of leadership in the banking business will be to define what businesses the bank chooses to compete in, and what businesses it does not choose to compete in. And having made those decisions, banks and other intermediaries, I think, will invest and organize those businesses so that they can be managed as integrated units. That breaks a lot of the organizational molds in which we are operating today, but I believe this is what is going to happen in the successful financial services companies.

And that leads to the next point, which is that people working for the successful competitors over time are going to get rich. Compensation policies in the industry will be increasingly refashioned to reward more successfully good economic and business performance for the enterprise. In the successful competitor we are going to get away from the formalized hierarchical compensation structure that is characteristic of the industry today. The reason is that good people who manage to get successful results will have to participate meaningfully in those results in personal terms. This always happens in a successful business.

The last point relates to the competitive position of an entity in the marketplace. As we have seen, the major competitors will compete in the global marketplace, and develop and manage a worldwide business franchise. Those that do not will develop either a distinctive name or market niche that they will be able to hold against all comers. So that what is ahead is a further tiering of competition involving all financial intermediaries.

Clearly, very significant institutions are getting into the game, and when that happens, you usually see a competitive situation in which, as I've said, a relatively small number of firms move towards increasingly strong market positions, in which middle-sized institutions tend to be squeezed competitively, and specialized entities tend to find and hold their niche in the marketplace for the long run. The successful competitors will either achieve market dominance or a distinctive niche that they can defend for the long term.

I'll make the suggestion that you evaluate your own institution against these 10 criteria, believing that it will give you some insight as to how to plan your own respective future. Thank you very much.

Response to Questions

A new report on strategic planning released by the BAI tends to say that the technology is such that it evens out and so it's very difficult to gain a competitive edge over time. And that seems to be in contrast to what I have suggested to you today about technological dominance.

I think if you mean by an edge in technology a proprietary edge in which your technological innovation is significantly different from what anybody else has, that's probably correct. But I think the way we should look at technology is as a total managerial approach to conducting the banking business.

The full application of the technology in terms of all of the business functions — from the distribution function all the way through the on-line accounting function — this is where I think the distinctive edges are achieved. In other words, it's the competence to manage and apply and exploit in a managerial sense the technology which is really I think the distinctive edge as opposed to the wrinkle in the software or the hardware itself.

Conclusion

I think every one of these issues to some degree poses a serious difficult decision for management. I'm conscious of the fact that you're calling into critical question here some of the things that we've been accustomed to in the banking business since anybody can remember.

And yet where we are is a sense that we're in a deregulated situation, we have severe competitive pressures to cope with, and I think we can understand what those are and the significance of what those are, so the question of how we do business in this thing is a very fundamental one. To make a decision on managerial autonomy or distribution costs or something like that is going to be a very, very tough call, especially in view of the traditions that have been operative in each particular institution.

And so I think one of the final criteria of competitive success or failure will be how the management team in each institution makes these calls on these particular questions. But I'm pretty sure that this list is the right set of questions to be on the table right now for the banking industry. ■ high level of interest rates, a decline in consumer demand, and the continued sluggishness of investment demand.

In this period of world economic uncertainty, the dollar remained strong throughout the year, despite a reduction in U.S. interest rates in the latter part of 1982. As a result, all the major currencies of the world fell against the dollar. For example, of the 70 foreign currencies charted by the American Banker for the listing of the world's top banks, 67 fell vis-a-vis the dollar, and two were unchanged. The only currency to gain against the dollar was the Ethiopian birr, which was up a modest 0.6%.

The largest decline against the dollar last year was the 83.8% drop in the value of the Mexican peso, from 3.8 U.S. cents per peso on Dec. 31, 1981, to 0.616 cent per peso on Dec. 31, 1982. The latter exchange rate was the floating rate in effect on Dec. 31. The official rate was 1.05 cents per peso at yearend.

The second largest drop vis-a-vis the dollar was the 77% decline in the Argentine peso, from 0.01 cent per peso to 0.0023 cent over the year. On June 1, 1983, the Argentine banking authorities issued the "new peso," which is equivalent to 10,000 old pesos. The issuance of the new peso has bolstered the value of the Argentine currency against the dollar. At midyear, the new peso was worth approximately 11.5 U.S. cents.

The Israeli shekel fell 52.7%, and the Brazilian cruzeiro dropped 49.6%.

For Mexico, Argentina, and Brazil, the devaluations of their respective currencies against the dollar exceeded the rate of inflation of their banks' deposits denominated in local currency. Thus, the dollar-denominated deposits of the banks in these countries fell last year.

The Mexican banks were affected most, and their dollar-denominated deposits fell 75%. For example, Bancomer, Mexico's largest bank, had deposits of $4.42 billion (717.7 billion pesos) at yearend 1982, to rank 237th. A year earlier, it had total deposits of $17.4 billion (457.2 billion pesos), ranking 84th in the world.

Argentine banks' dollar-denominated deposits fell 44%, and Brazilian banks' deposits fell 3.2%.

Deposits in Israeli banks were up 25%, as local currency deposit gains outpaced devaluation. In addition, the drop in the shekel's value increased the translated value of Israeli banks' foreign currency deposits, which are sizable for most Isreali banks.

Major Country Changes

Commercial banking powers were granted to Japanese savings banks last year. As a result, these banks, known as "sogo banks," were included in the survey. And their impact was significant, bolstering the deposit totals of the top 500 banks.

There were 19 sogo banks ranked among the top 500 banks in the world, and these banks had $64 billion in deposits. Had the sogos been excluded from the survey, total deposits of the top 500 banks would have fallen by 0.2%. In addition, four more American banks would have ranked among the top 500 in the world.

The largest sogo bank in the listing is the 181st-ranked Nishinippon Sogo Bank Ltd., Fukuoka, with $6.04 billion in deposits.

The Netherlands also had changes. Financial reporting requirements for the banks of that country were changed by the Dutch central bank, De Nederlansche Bank, pursuant to Article 11, Section 2, of the Act on Supervision of Credit Institutions. The major change appears to be the new requirement for banks to consolidate the accounts of other financial institutions of which the banks own more than 50%. The effect of this consolidation has been a reduction in the total deposits reported by Dutch banks.

In Australia, there were two major mergers last year. On Oct. 1, Westpac Banking Corp., Sydney, was formed when the Bank of New South Wales, Sydney, and the Commercial Bank of Australia, Melbourne, merged to form a $20.1 billion-deposit institution that ranked 76th in the world.

Also on Oct.1, the National Commercial Banking Corp. of Australia Ltd., Melbourne, was formed when the National Bank of Australasia Ltd., Melbourne, and the Commercial Banking Co. of Sydney Ltd. merged to form a $12.7 billion-deposit bank that ranked 111th in the world last year.

This year, the American Banker, for the first time, presents its survey findings in two parts. Today, the top 500 banks in the world in deposits are listed. Tommorrow, the top 500 banks in the world in assets will be listed.

A new alphabetical listing of the top 500 banks in deposits appears on pages 92-94. This listing should help the reader more easily locate all of the banks in today's listings and most of the banks in tomorrow's listings, because the deposit rank and asset rank is shown for each bank.

The American Banker, in tomorrow's edition, will attempt to identify the foreign banking offices of the top 100 U.S. banking companies. This will be the first such listing by the American Banker in five years.

Other Survey Findings

- The Bank of America NT&SA, San Francisco, retained its position as the world's largest commercial bank, with deposits of $95 billion, down 1% from the $96 billion of a year earlier. This was reported in the July 14 edition of the American Banker.
- Total deposits of the 500 largest banks in the world rose only $17.5 billion, or 0.3%, to reach $5.23 trillion on Dec. 31.
- The current tabulation consists of 403 foreign banks with deposits of $4.44 trillion and 97 U.S. banks with deposits of $794 million. In 1981, 403 foreign banks had $4.41 trillion in deposits, and 97 U.S. banks had $806 million.
- There are 55 countries with banks ranked among the top 500 in the world. The five largest are: Japan, with $1.28 trillion in deposits in its 95 banks; the United States, with $794 million in 97 banks; Germany, with $539 million in 35 banks; France, with $447 million in 23 banks; and the United Kingdom, with $380 million in 30 banks.
- Among the top four foreign countries, the biggest deposit gain was made by the Japanese banks. Their deposits rose 7.6%. However, the sogo banks accounted for the bulk of the increase. Excluding the sogos, the deposits of the other Japanese banks rose only 1.9%.

Deposits for the banks in the United Kingdom were up 1%, but the deposits for Germany were down 5%, and the deposits of French banks were down 3%.

Among the individual foreign banks, the largest gains in deposits were recorded by 107th-ranked Bank Saderat Iran, Tehran, whose deposits rose 82%, to $13.1 billion, and 171st-ranked Arab Banking Corp., Manama, Bahrain, whose deposits rose 78%, to $6.7 billion.

The largest percentage drops were recorded by two Mexico City-based banks: 237th-ranked Bancomer, whose deposits fell 75% to $4.4 billion, and 244th-ranked Banco Nacional de Mexico, whose deposits were down 67% to $4.3 billion.

Data Received Too Late

Data for five banks were not received by the July 5 deadline for inclusion in the tabulation. Of the five, four would have ranked among the top 1,000 banks in deposits.

The largest of these banks was Deutsh-Sudamerikanische Bank, Hamburg, a subsidiary of Dresdner Bank, Frankfurt, with $1.95 billion in deposits at yearend 1982. Had the data been received earlier, the bank would have ranked 509th in deposits.

The next largest bank was Nuevo Banco Ambrosiano, Milan, with $1.77 billion in deposits on Dec. 31, which would have made it the world's 539th largest bank. The bank was formed by Italian banking authorities last year to handle the domestic banking operations of the failed Banco Ambrosiano.

Before its failure, Banco Ambrosiano was Italy's eighth largest bank and the 99th largest in the world, with $13.3 billion in deposits on Dec. 31, 1981.

Banco Nacional de Descuento, Caracas, Venezuela, reported total deposits of $1.43 billion, which would have ranked it 621st at yearend. A year earlier, it ranked 564th, with $1.4 billion in deposits.

Banco Mexicano Somex, Mexico City, which ranked 176th with deposits of $6.5 billion at yearend 1981, reported total deposits of $916.4 million at yearend 1982, which would have dropped it to 811th place on this year's listing.

Banco Rio de la Plata, Buenos Aires, the 736th largest bank in the world with $812 million in deposits at yearend 1981, reported deposits of $530 million on Dec. 31, dropping it out of ranks of the world's top 1,000 banks. ■
